1st International Symposium on Kallikreins

Lausanne, September 1-3, 2005

Highlight on kallikreins

Human tissue kallikreins (hKs), which are encoded by the largest contiguous cluster of protease genes in the human genome, are secreted serine proteases with diverse expression patterns and physiological roles. Although primarily known for their clinical applicability as cancer biomarkers, recent evidence implicates hKs in many cancer-related processes, including cell-growth regulation, angiogenesis, invasion and metastasis. They have been shown to promote or inhibit neoplastic progression, acting individually and/or in cascades with other hKs and proteases, and might represent attractive targets for therapeutic intervention.

Situation

Overlooking Lake Geneva and facing the majestic splendor of the snow-capped Alps, surrounded by forests and vineyards, the city of Lausanne boasts a backdrop of scenic beauty that is simply breathtaking. In 1994, Lausanne was officially awarded the title of Olympic Capital, a unique and prestigious distinction. Provincial Capital of the Canton of Vaud, with a population of 250 000, Lausanne stands at the heart of French-speaking Switzerland and has also a very rich history.
